Coastal County Aggregations

Many social science data sets are collected and commonly reported using political boundaries, especially counties. As a result, “coastal counties” has emerged as common and readily recognizable framework to describe the human dimension of the coast.

NOAA references two different coastal county suites for reporting demographic and economic information. The first county suite is the Coastal Watershed Counties, where land use and water quality changes most directly impact coastal ecosystems. The permanent U.S. population that resides in the Coastal Watershed Counties can be thought of as “the population that most directly affects the coast.” The second county suite is the Coastal Shoreline Counties, those counties that are directly adjacent to the open ocean, major estuaries, and the Great Lakes, and which due to their proximity to these waters, bear a great proportion of the full range of effects from coastal hazards (not just coastal inundation) and host the majority of economic production associated with coastal and ocean resources. The permanent U.S. population that resides in the Coastal Shoreline Counties can be thought of as “the population most directly affected by the coast.” Both the Coastal Watershed Counties and the Coastal Shoreline Counties are based on 2010 county boundaries. For more detailed information on this model see the associated peer-reviewed journal article “‘The Coast’ Is Complicated: A Model to Consistently Describe the Nation’s Coastal Population” (coast.noaa.gov/data/digitalcoast/pdf/qrt-coast-complicated.pdf).

In addition to the two coastal county definitions listed below, NOAA produces a dataset, Economics: National Ocean Watch (ENOW), that describes data on the oceans and Great Lakes economy. The ENOW data use a county definition that is similar to, but not the same as, the Coastal Shoreline Counties. For more information on the ENOW counties, please see the ENOW Counties List (coast.noaa.gov/data/digitalcoast/pdf/enow-counties-list.pdf)

Coastal Watershed Counties

The U.S. population that most directly affects the coast resides in a standard suite of Coastal Watershed Counties where land use and water quality changes most directly impact coastal ecosystems. NOAA developed a list of coastal counties based on NOAA coastal watersheds and U.S. Geological Survey (USGS) coastal cataloging units as delineated in the NOAA Coastal Assessment Framework (CAF). This method emphasizes land areas within which water flows into the ocean or Great Lakes, and provides a broader, coastal watershed focus to the delineation coastal counties. Through this method, a county is considered a Coastal Watershed County if one of the following criteria is met: (1) at a minimum, 15 percent of the county’s total land area is located within a coastal watershed or (2) a portion of or an entire county accounts for at least 15 percent of a coastal USGS 8-digit cataloging unit. The 15-percent rule was selected as an appropriate level for capturing counties with a significant impact on coastal and ocean resources.

There are a few exceptions to these rules. Cook and Lake Counties in Illinois, as examples, do not meet the 15 percent rule for a coastal watershed or a coastal cataloging unit. However, they directly border Lake Michigan, so they are included in the suite of coastal watershed counties. There are three other instances where single counties were designated as noncoastal because they did not meet the 15 percent criteria, but they are completely surrounded by coastal watershed counties that do meet the 15 percent criteria. In three instances—Allan Parish, Louisiana; Highlands, Florida; and Greene, North Carolina—counties were included in NOAA’s coastal watershed county suite. In addition, NOAA does not include Alaska or Hawaii in its Coastal Assessment Framework. However, all counties (boroughs and census areas in Alaska) where the shoreline of the 2010 Census County Boundary intersects with a cataloging unit are considered coastal. As a result, all five of Hawaii’s counties, and 25 of Alaska’s, are included in NOAA’s suite of coastal watershed counties.

Coastal Shoreline Counties

The U.S. population most directly affected by the coast resides in a standard suite of Coastal Shoreline Counties that are directly adjacent to the open ocean, major estuaries, and the Great Lakes, which due to their proximity to these waters, bear a great proportion of the full range of effects from coastal hazards and host the majority of economic production associated with coastal and ocean resources. The Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) has defined a coastal county as one that (1) has a coastline bordering the open ocean or Great Lakes coasts (or associated sheltered water bodies), or (2) contains velocity zones (V-zones) or coastal high hazard areas. V-zones are areas where wave heights more than 3 feet and/or high velocity water can cause structural damage in a 100-year flood, a flood with a 1-percent chance of occurring or being exceeded in a given year.
