

DAVIDSON FELLOWSHIP

The first class of the Margaret A. Davidson Graduate Fellowship program has been selected. Welcome and congratulations to all!

Meet the 2020-2022 Davidson Fellows

Twenty-nine students, coming from 24 different universities, are ready to get started! This fellowship program is exciting because of what will be accomplished in the field of coastal resource management, as well as the program's focus on developing tomorrow's class of leaders. Let's see what this first class is looking forward to.

- "This project is a great opportunity for me to not only utilize my experiences from previous research projects, but to expand and refine my practices in collecting visitor data while utilizing new and innovative methods and technologies."
 - "I am particularly excited by the idea of collaborating with researchers from within and across disciplines, and the opportunity to apply my results to ecosystem management discussions."
 - "I value inclusiveness and empathy . . . and am eager to participate in the comprehensive professional development opportunities offered through the fellowship, including project management, leadership, coastal management skills, and career planning."
 - "I want my future career to have a potential impact on both natural resources and the people that benefit from them. I believe that NERRS and places like it would provide me the dynamic career that I am looking for."
 - "The primary reason I returned for my PhD is so I can gain experience working on a cross-disciplinary management-oriented project that addresses questions and needs identified by stakeholders. The Davidson Fellowship would provide me the opportunity to conduct PhD work at a NERR site, providing mentorship from individuals from a variety of disciplines, and networking opportunities to further define my career goals."
